Events this weekend east bay area

May makes a great time to visit Dallas-Fort Worth when the sun shines and the flowers are in full bloom. Visiting snowmen can swap their boots for flip-flops and enjoy the beautiful spring temperatures in the metro region. Local Texans also come out of wood, because this is the month when the area blooms with arts and music festivals, fireworks and even a home-made Mother's Day tour. (You will take it off above the architecture!) Go out and make the most of the offer. Just pack your raincoat in case of a shower. Many of the events below have been cancelled or postponed for 2020. For more details, check the web page of each list. 01 of 12 Loadmaster/Wikimedia Commons/CC BY-SA 3.0 Also known as Scarborough Fair, this Renaissance event brings you back to 1533, during the reign of King Henry VIII of England. The festival, which began in 1981, takes place on eight consecutive weekends, including the Remembrance Day weekend. The party consists of about 200 performances on 21 stage and three jousting tournaments a day. Food is also a spectacle with vendors serving huge turkey legs and sticky goodness, while pubs and pubs serve drinks for adults. Book family tickets and bring in children under four for free. 02 of 12 Steve Rainwater/Flickr/CC BY-SA 2.0 The Cottonwood Art Festival - a true art show that takes place on the first weekend of May in neighboring Richardson, Texas - includes works by a national artist in addition to food, music, drinks and art workshops for children. Check out SlideshowKo airport and train station, residence can be departure points for life's grand adventures. For a couple from Manhattan he is a psychotherapist and he's a real estate lawyer, buying a 1,670-square-foot condominium overlooking the hills of San Francisco was an opportunity to explore the city's Pacific rim culture and, perhaps more importantly, the terrain of the heart. The couple was ready for a new place and a new role for themselves as grandparents, the wife says of their decision to put roots near their young grandchildren in San Francisco. (They drive from their primary residence in New York.) We love the topography and the ease of life, the Asian vibe. We wanted the residence to be emblematic of who we were in San Francisco. Long time connoisseurs of contemporary art and architecture, the couple asked for a sophisticated apartment for themselves that would also act as a warm gathering place for an extended family. Asian aesthetics are very compassionate to ours, explains the man. It's all in simplicity, line and form. Of course, every hard-will needs sherpa. The couple, who even plan to go to dinner, says his wife, are still beset about how easily they settled on the Wiseman group and senior designer Judy McBride. They explored the company and admired the model of housing and interior design that Paul Vincent Wiseman designed for St. Louis. Regis Residences, where they now occupy the first floor. Maybe it was that fabulous karma. Their thing is contemporary, says McBride, whose first in-depth design meeting with its well-being travelers took place in a VIP lounge at San Francisco International Airport. But this residence is moving west, closer to Asia. For those who want architectural details (and who isn't?), even the most exhipable modern building can present challenges. Here were thorny issues of low ceiling and structural beam under windows that flowed along the entire length of the apartment. It was complicated, says Wiseman. We wanted something bold, but simple. His solution was in the form of a series of wood-paneled shelves with Asian-inspired joinery equipment and bronze hardware - a modern abstraction of traditional Japanese tansu. Shelves visually anchor the interior and, in the master bedroom, appears to the edge of the window. For further frames and determination of the room, the Wiseman Group designed the dividing line of the rooms between the master bedroom and the lair, which acts as a set of doors, but reads like a panel wall, which established a strong architectural presence. There were no details, wiseman is watching. That's why we had to create it. McBride and the couple searched the Bay Area in search of fine Chinese and Japanese objects and works by Bay Area artists - expeditions that took them from Sausalito to Jackson Square. Judy and I had a lot of fun going to places, my wife recalls. This new ancient world has opened up to us. Among their sites was the exosterated bricks of the Han dynasty from the tomb, which turned into a lamp, and les Guanyin from the 12th century. Several sculptures in the residence, including this one, are missing weapons. As a psychotherapist, I've done a lot of numbers on myself, muse's wife. They were also looking for items near their Manhattan home. In a New York antiquis gallery, my wife noticed the rough figures of the Han dynasty with a patino, randomly piling up under the table. We thought they were wonderful, he says. Judy protected them with an extremely beautiful metal brace. But seismic wax was the glow of the urn. And because the couple were about to entertain their young grandchildren, it was important to create durable - but attractive - pieces that could hold their own while playing. Behind the living room, wiseman team designed handsome leather, Asian-inspired breasts for storage. Asian antiques and works by Manuel Neri and other Bay Area artists are charmingly communicable with books such as Good Night San Francisco and Hop on Pop. The western exposure of the living room, towards the Pacific, is muted with Japanese bamboo shutters, folding shoji, designed custom, amphished light between the kitchen and the dining room. The residence is proof that in the hands of wiseman group newly acquired couple monikers - Nanny and grumpy - he did not require the sacrifice of a single iota of elegance. When I walk in, it feels calm and rested, like a nice holding environment that contains you in a safe and comfortable way, says the wife. I originally told Judy that I just wanted to go to Crate and Barrel, adding a little fun. Things have changed.
